Our nation is facing a child care crisis. Child care has long been unaffordable and hard to find for working families. Many child care programs struggle to stay in business and can only afford to pay their early childhood educators poverty-level wages. The COVID-19 pandemic pushed the already fragile child care sector to the brink of collapse.

Congress responded by providing historic and needed investments for child care, including $24 billion in the American Rescue Plan for a new Child Care Stabilization Grant Program. These grants have kept 220,000 child care providers afloat over the last few years, saving child care for as many as 10 million children nationwide and helping to ensure that working families can continue to access the child care they rely on.

But this vital funding runs out on September 30, 2023, and will bring our nation's broken child care sector back to the brink of collapse. Child care programs continue to need funding to help pay their staff and cover operating expenses and have nowhere to turn for more revenue since parents are already stretched thin.

When funding expires, programs say they may need to reduce already-low staff wages, increase tuition for families, serve fewer children, or shut down all together. An analysis from the Century Foundation finds that if Congress does not provide additional funding for the nation's child care sector:

- More than 70,000 child care programs—one-third of those supported by stabilization funding—could close, causing approximately 3.2 million children to lose their child care spots and jeopardizing jobs for 232,000 child care workers.
- The loss in tax and business revenue could cost states $10.6 billion in economic activity per year. Additionally, millions of parents will likely either leave the workforce or reduce their hours, which could cost families an estimated $9 billion each year in lost earnings.

The Child Care Stabilization Act would prevent this crisis by providing $16 billion in mandatory funding each year for the next five years to continue the successful Child Care Stabilization Grant Program. This investment would ensure child care providers continue to receive a stable and reliable source of funding to help them deliver high-quality child care for working families.
